

Education, Labor, and Health in Asia-Pacific Modernization, 1910-1945: Rethinking Imperialism

This book explores the intertwined histories of education, labor, and health in the Asia-Pacific region during the early 20th century, shedding new light on the region's experiences of imperialism and modernization. Drawing on a wide range of sources, the book examines how colonial governments, missionaries, and local elites sought to shape the education, labor, and health of colonized peoples, and how these efforts were met with resistance and adaptation. The book also explores the ways in which education, labor, and health were central to the emergence of new social and political movements in the region.

Education

Education was a key site of imperial intervention in the Asia-Pacific region. Colonial governments saw education as a way to socialize colonized peoples into the values and norms of the colonizing power. They also saw education as a way to train a workforce that could meet the needs of the colonial economy. However, colonized peoples often resisted these attempts to control their education. They established their own schools and curricula, and they used education to promote their own political and cultural agendas.
